SAMPLE INTERNALS

JANUARY 7 Monday	JANUARY 8 Tuesday	JANUARY 9 Wednesday
2015: Doctors can use brain imaging to "predict" patient's future	2015: Star vanishes as it warps space-time around itself	2013: Flexible, paper-thin computer tablets unveiled
A study led by John Gabrieli, PhD, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, claimed the ability to predict a patient's future learning, criminality, and health-related behaviors via analysis of neuroimaging. The predictions include a student's potential struggles or failings, a criminal's likelihood of repeating his or her offense, and an individual's propensity for alcoholism or drug abuse. While many have raised ethical concerns about this process, the team believes in the process's usefulness in early identification and treatment of individuals with potential issues.	An international team of astrophysicists led by Ingrid Stairs, PhD, of the University of British Columbia, successfully calculated both the mass and space-time warping effect of a pair of stars in a distant galaxy. The two, one neutron and one binary, are each heavier than our sun, yet they are more than one hundred times closer to each other than the distance between the earth and the sun. Scientists say that because of the extreme gravity created by this close proximity, the pair and others like it provide rare and invaluable data about the nature of space-time.	Partnered with Intel Labs and Plastic Logic, a group of developers from Queen's University in Ontario, Canada, produced a new computer tablet as thin as a piece of notebook paper and almost as flexible. Intended to emulate traditional paperwork, the technology aims to allow users the ability to interact with separate pieces of information in a physical, tactile manner. Rather than flipping through browser tabs, users would use multiple inexpensive, paper-thin tablets at the same time to organize planning and projects.
